THE TRIALS OF COMRADE TROTMAN

According to J. Trotman,
(1) Electoral activity is short-term; socialist propaganda is long-term. Therefore socialist propaganda and contesting elections are opposed.
(2) Electoral activity—that is, fighting elections—is sensational; good for anti-socialist organisations, but bad for a Socialist Party. It is a wrong method.
(3) Elections “provide a figure-head for one month in every five years”. Therefore the Socialist Party, when contesting elections, has “heads” (figure-heads), i.e., candidates. If it has “heads”, these must be leaders of the “non-heads”. Consequently, during elections the Socialist Party becomes non-democratic, i.e., ceases to be Socialist. In fact, the more candidates, the less Socialist.

If these statements are correct, it is self-evident that the S.P.G.B., so far, has been wrong. These statements are NOT consideration of immediate difficulties in Party work—they are a denial of its principles.

Question of Principles
Trotman states early in his article that “no one will deny that [parliamentary representation] is impossible for us at the moment and nobody argues from this point of view”; in the next sentence, however, “some use this as an argument. This is quite right—” “some” is J. Trotman.

Friend T. is evidently not quite clear on the meaning of socialist principles. These principles have nothing whatever to do with £800, or £1500, or £49 worth of pamphlets, nor with increases in the Party’s debts, or the size of its offices.

The principles of the Party were decided on the facts of Capitalism, out of which they arose, irrespective of practical expediency or immediate applicability. The people who founded it decided that the only way of implementing its policy was by parliamentary representation. That had to be decided first. They decided that without any money, loans or premises.

This Party principle will remain right whether the Party is rich or poor, small or large, gets many votes or none. The first thing, when organising a Party, is to decide what it stands for and how to get it. Then, starting out to do it, cross your bridges as you come to them. Trotman and his friends prefer to sit at home, frightening each other with ghost stories about the depth of the water.

There are practical difficulties—of course it will be expensive and arduous, but money will be raised, speakers trained, and members gained in the actual work of fighting elections.

The Party’s aim, Socialism, determines its nature as an election-fighting organisation. Everything else is secondary to this fundamental thing. The Party can and should announce its desire to contest at every election. If practical considerations (lack of support) deter it, it should say so plainly, telling the worker the difficulties, but making its object and method clear. When members invent reasons for putting the Party’s principles into cold storage they take the first step on the road to reformism.

The Main Purpose
Having dismissed Parliamentary representation because it is not immediately possible, friend J. T. then goes on to consider whether “the Party gains some benefit from contesting an election which is not directly related to this main purpose”. Please tell us, Comrade Trotman, what other purpose the Party has which is not even related to its main one.

According to Trotman, among these unrelated secondary purposes are meetings and selling pamphlets. These are not the purposes of the Party, but merely means of making Socialists. Trotman implies that Parliamentary activity is abnormal, that is, irregular and exceptional. If this is true, it must be permanently wrong under any (normal) circumstances.

“One resources will always be meagre,” he says. By this, he evidently has funds (money) in mind. These are not, and never will be, the resources of the Party. Even if they were, to say that they will always be meagre can only mean that the Socialist Party will never have the support of many workers.

This is a denial of the meaning of Socialism, which organises class conscious workers politically. If the Party’s resources will always be meagre, then the time will never be opportune to run candidates. Although his article is entitled “Is the Time Opportune for Contesting Elections?”, Trotman does not spare one word in 1300 to give us his answer to his own question.

If the resources of the Socialist Party were money, then Capitalism would not be the possession of all surplus money by the capitalist class. The resources of the Party are the enthusiasm and energy of its members, which spring from a clear grasp of its principles.

Value of Contesting
Trotman’s sole test of the value of contesting elections is:
(1) The number of indoor meetings held in the constituencies.
(2) The amount of literature sold.

These meetings, he says, could be held without a candidate; and we “only” sold £49 worth of pamphlets more in the year the election took place—“an increase only to be expected during the height of an election”, he writes.

Then friend Trotman, who “only” expects us to sell about 2000 pamphlets more during elections than we can when nothing is on, proposes, as his alternative, that this bankrupt Party, impoverished by reckless election spendthrifts, should print pamphlets and give them away for nothing when the workers don’t want them—that is, when elections are OFF, not ON.

Comrade T. does not tell us why he expects more pamphlets to be sold during elections. Why, he says, there were no enquiries about the Party after the election, whereas “a small and inexpensive advertisement in an Esperanto journal produced numerous enquiries from all parts of the world”.

The enquiries were made only because we ran candidates. The only thing which divides us from the host of freaks and cranks of all kinds, organised in several thousand tin-pot outfits, and makes the S.P. a political party, is the running of candidates independently, in opposition to all other parties.

“When we contest elections—... we get a great kick out of it,” says Trotman. “We all have a strong desire to indulge in it. Election campaigns provide a stimulus for the members and increase their activity.” But “the stimulus lasts no longer than the actual campaign” so “it must be guarded against.” In other words, it’s a good thing so let’s stop it.
THE NATURE OF THE SOCIALIST REVOLUTION

2. HISTORICAL MATERIALISM

The mode of change from Capitalism to Socialism cannot be discussed without discussing both the nature of Socialism and the nature of Capitalism, and particular phases of society cannot be discussed without reference to a general theory of history. History in turn is the unique attribute of man. It is possible only because men are what they are, and takes the course it does because men are what they are. A theory of men, a theory of society and a theory of history are the same thing. A theory of history which is not a theory of men or a theory of men which is not a theory of society, is a meaningless abstraction. Society is not a contrivance discovered or agreed upon by men, which they could conceivably relinquish: it is the mode of human existence. But man is not uniquely social, only socially unique. Only human society evolves.

This is simple enough, yet its implications are not necessarily observed, or may even be repudiated, and a nominal subscribing to materialism may not preclude an actual metaphysical outlook. For instance, there are those for whom it is sufficient to say that human nature is the product of human history, and who regard with suspicion the view that history is the product of human nature. Ask how comes history, and they reply "economic"; ask how comes economics and they reply "food, clothing and shelter." But the need for food, etc., is common to all creatures. It accounts for their activity, but not for human history. What accounts for history is the peculiar cumulative character of the human economic activity, the special quality of human labour, which rests on the biological structure of men. This links historical with biological evolution, and rescues materialism from the metaphysical which arbitrarily breaks the chain of causal sequence, arbitrarily fixes its undetermined beginning—creation out of nothing, called materialism. This kind of economic determinism parodies historical materialism because its theory of history is not a theory of man but a theory of economics. It sees human nature as the product of history but not history as the product of human nature. The materialist who wants a theory of history without any truck with human nature may only be reacting against the idealist, who discusses human nature abstracted from history. But the materialist who thus merely inverts the terms of the abstraction remains idealist—as the atheist who is merely anti-God is an inverted theist, and the Socialist who is merely anti-Capitalist an inverted bourgeois. Socialist theory requires the recognition that human nature determines the fact, and limits the possibilities, of history; while history determines the nature, and conditions the possibility, of human conduct. To say that human nature is as human nature does (i.e., that human nature is human conduct) is like saying, with the capitalist economists, that "money is as money does" (i.e., that anything is money that serves as money—salt, tobacco, furs, fish, shells, gold, paper—which tells us something about salt, etc., but nothing about money).

The reluctance to distinguish between human nature as the fact of human nature, and human conduct as conditioned by history, undermines a unified concept of human society, and shows itself in many ways. It underlies the insistence that language preceeds thinking, thus ignoring the dependence of language on the prior capacity to conceive relationships. It leads to the view that since moral codes are laid down by exploiting classes for the guidance of the exploited, then classless Socialism will be amoral. It hinders any practical starting point to the discussion of what Socialism will look like beyond what is permanent in specifically human nature over and above what is common to all creatures, the need for food, etc. It is a cataract which obscures the unity of history, the gravitational pull which holds history to its orbit, and gives "the historical necessity for Socialism" its necessity. The equating of human nature with human conduct—the view, that is, that environment is the sole determinant of human capacities—is a political weapon of the Communist, not of the Socialist. It is the official cult of Russia, whose academicians teach that there are no natural boundaries to the behaviour of wheat, cows or men, that man is what the State enjoins.

The rich, genetically determined variation in innate individual abilities which is a factor in making human history possible—a myriad multiplication of opposite thumbs—cannot be dismissed without dismissing the basis of biological evolution—which is not the right answer to the false social deductions of some geneticists. The equating of human conduct with human nature merely inverts their error, and opens as many windows to idealism as it closes doors: either the moral nihilism which makes Socialism look like the vacumistic absence of Capitalism, or the moral utopianism which reduces it to a rational idea. One makes it look like nothing, the other like nothing on earth.

ON BACKWARD NATIONS

I submit the following propositions on the subject of "Backward Nations", which summarise the views I put forward at the recent Forums. In order not to take up space unnecessarily, I have refrained from including either argument or evidence for the different propositions as this can be done, where necessary, in reply to specific criticisms.

1. There are no groups of people anywhere on earth, regardless of their present culture, who are incapable of assimilating socialist ideas.

2. The so-called backwardness of groups of people has nothing to do with mental capacity or the capacity to assimilate modern ideas. The culture of such people is complex but of a different kind from that of the West. These groups are coming into the orbit of Western technique at the level of Western understanding, without being burdened with the weight of traditional ideas that helps to hold back the mass of people in the West. Coming in at the present level of Western technique, they borrow the ideas associated with it, including revolutionary ideas. Coming fresher into this minefield, they progress rapidly, shedding primitive or customary ideas almost overnight.

3. Whilst older generations, who have become habituated to old custom, may not be quick in grasping new culture, the young take to new culture easily. Capitalism has not the standing grip that it has in the West.

4. Outside of Europe and the U.S.A., the mass of the world's population has already come directly into the Western orbit of culture and is being rapidly transformed—for example China, India, Indonesia, Japan, S. America and a large part of Africa. Where the impact of the West is strong, established customs are broken and the way becomes relatively easy to a new culture.

5. From the socialist point of view the mass of people in the West are still backward. The so-called backward groups borrow Western ideas but without the Western traditional background that helps to curb progress. This makes it easier for them to forge ahead. On the basis of progress in this century the "backward" will have reached a common outlook with the "advanced" by the time the latter have accepted the socialist outlook.

6. All groups of people, regardless of present culture, can understand socialism if it is explained to them in language that is appropriate to their types of culture. Therefore, the attitude of a socialist is to preach Socialism and help to develop a movement for Socialism wherever he may be, regardless of the particular type of culture of the people to whom he is addressing his propaganda.

7. Finally, it is not essential for all groups of people to achieve socialism before they can achieve wealth. Capitalism (though they probably will) in order to take part in the establishment of Socialism in the world at large.

8. The above propositions are based upon the fact that, after the long and chequered development of private property society, the modern idea of Socialism has eventually emerged—this idea can be transmitted everywhere.

The terms "East" and "West" that are used above have only been used as a convenient way of marking off highly industrialised areas from those that are behind in this respect.

G. McCLATCHIE.
THE THOMSON DISPUTE

Letters on S.S. article on "Censorship" held over from October.

From E. Lake.

One objection to the article is that it fails to give a balanced view of the question. The attempt on the part of a few printers to prevent the publication of a statement by Thomson & Co., is condemned with a heavy hand, while the overwhelming censorship exercised by the capitalist class is mentioned only in passing and receives little or no condemnation.

The orthodox press has developed the suppression and distortion of news to a fine art, and yet their hypocritical treatment of the printers’ feeble effort was not dealt with by us. However mistaken these men may have been in refusing to print Thomson’s statement, we must recognise that they were acting, as they thought, in the interest of their fellow workers. This aspect of the case should at least be appreciated by Socialists.

Another objection to the article is the claim that Trade Unions’ should not concern themselves with the constitution of the product of labour. Four examples are given to uphold this claim:

1. Vegetarian trade unionists would strike against handling meat.
2. Atheistic trade unionists would strike against handling Bibles.
3. Christian trade unionists would strike against handling certain scientific matter.
4. Cycling trade unionists would strike against handling motor cars.

These examples hardly call for serious discussion. Vegetarian trade unionists meat porters refusing to handle meat is a subject more suited to the pen of the late Mr. Gilbert than to that of our Gilmac.

No doubt these cases would call for our opposition, but other examples may support the opposite point of view.

Assume chemists were working on a certain substance they thought was to be used for medical purposes, and discover it was to be used to spread disease. Should we condemn their refusal to continue the production of this substance? Should we condemn transport workers for refusing to convoy troops to a strike area? Should we condemn workers employed in the processing of food, who refused to undertake a method of adulteration which, while strictly legal, would be more than normally injurious to the consumers of the food?

And finally, in the event of some jingo press owner attempting to publish a statement with the object of inciting a frenzied mob to attack the offices of the Socialist Party, should we condemn printers who refused to print such a statement?

The answer is emphatically No!

It is self evident that we cannot lay down a general policy opposing trade union action in this matter. We must consider and decide on such cases as they arise.

From C. C. Groves.

I am opposed to the Editorial for the following reasons:

1. We are telling the workers that they should give every assistance to their employers in a dispute. I cannot object to Thomson being able to express his point of view, but I cannot ask that the workers involved in the dispute, and other workers, should assist him to do so.

2. In asking workers to assist in the printing of Thomson’s article it is equivalent to urging soldiers in an army to load the rifles of their opponents.

3. I think it is to be regretted that such a condemnatory editorial, should have been published when not a word about the Thompson dispute had appeared in the S.S. It seems that we are going out of our way to condemn workers without taking the opportunity of supporting Thompson’s employees in their struggle against this avowed anti-union, anti-working-class member of the capitalist class.

From J. Trotman.

I think that the article was correct in what it said. To condemn any action directed towards limiting the free expression of opinion by anyone is contrary to the democratic principle of Socialism, and as such is very dangerous policy.

This does not mean that I view Democracy as an absolute or as one of the cardinal virtues of Socialism. It simply means that I recognise the possibility of workers making mistakes. If their ideas are correct they will be able to stand against the ideas of their opponents and there will be nothing to fear from opposition.

In short, I argue that the democratic approach is a practical proposition here and now. It seems that some would deny this.

As to the argument that workers are prevented from expressing their ideas by lack of facilities, surely it follows that if they have the power to prevent an article being published they also have the power to demand that their point of view be printed with the opponent’s argument; and, in point of fact, the City Press has already agreed to an arrangement of this character in the dispute in question. From the point of view of accuracy and the Party position I see no grounds for complaint.

It is, however, debatable whether such an article serves any useful purpose and certainly any attempt to deal with such a subject needs to be very carefully written, and, in my view, approached from a rather different angle.

As it is, the article could very easily create a false impression that we were taking up the cudgels on behalf of the employers, and that is not our job at any time. I think a much stronger sympathy for the workers and a greater understanding of their reactions should have been shown. It should also have been made perfectly clear from the start that our sole concern was the general interests of the working class, which of course includes the printing workers.
THE BALLOT & SOCIALISM

Will of Majority Thwarted?

WHAT do the Open Letter advocates mean by the ballot as the only weapon of emancipation? In the United States to-day, a majority can be kept from political power for a long period of time. Presumably by a majority the Open Letter means a majority of those elected to Congress, since it constantly quotes the SPGB with its ideas of conquering a majority of Parliament. Now, with the system of representation which prevails in the House—forgetting the Senate for a moment—an political party can have a majority of representatives without having a majority of the population. For example, several states are no, on the basis of population, entitled to even one representative, but the Constitution guarantees them one. In the Senate each state is entitled to two members regardless of population. Thus, 13 and a half million people in New York have the same representation as 110,000 in Nevada (1940 census).

The Open Letter advocates would suggest a change in this system of representation, but do they state how it must be done? Such a change would have to be a constitutional amendment, and the amendments are not carried by a majority. It takes a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress to offer an amendment (and under the system of proportion described above, this might mean a representation of 75 or 80 per cent. of the population), or upon application by three-fourths (75 per cent.) of the state legislatures, Congress must call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments. Then, the amendments must be ratified by three-fourths of the state legislatures or conventions in three-fourths of the states, whichever Congress may propose.

This constitutional amendment process was purposely introduced by the so-called Founding Fathers (the business and property interests) to thwart the will of the majority.

How then, we ask the Open Letter comrades, can the majority assert itself? How could the majority make any change in the present economic system? To advocate by-passing the Constitution would be to bring the charges against the WSP of advocating "unconstitutional methods" and of being "revolutionaries." The Socialist Labor Party does not miss the point. It openly advocates its change through article V of the Constitution, which is the one described above for making amendments.

How Majority Will Assert Itself

When the conscious majority come about, does one think for a moment that it will permit itself to be thwarted by such measures as required by the constitution? It will assert itself, perhaps to the extent of setting up a special convention representation of the people. This will be a vote; it will be an expression of the majority. Would the Open Letter advocate such a method (incidentally, a completely non-violent one, to answer their charge of our advocating violence) and will it come out and state the position of the WSP to be the assertion of the majority, regardless of what the Constitution demands of this score?

Further, under the present system of electing Representatives and Senators, there is a two year lag in the case of the former, and a six year lag in the case of the latter. Thus, it is possible for the majority of Congress not to represent a majority of the population because immediately following an election, a change of sentiment may come about among the workers, and yet it could be six years before a new election for Senators could be held, or it could even be eighteen years before the majority would be able to assert itself. What would the Open Letter advocates do in a case like that? If they demanded a recall, a new election, this would be the ballot, but it would not be according to the ballot system as it exists to-day.

As a matter of fact, how could a socialist take a seat in Congress, if he is to do so he must swear to uphold the Constitution, which permits the use of armed forces to put down strikes, and defends private property at every turn? The case of Victor Berger being seated during the first World War, after he was rejected several times by Congress, is cited as an example of how the will of the majority (in his district) was finally asserted. But Berger was a social democrat, and social democrats not only do not oppose capitalism from a revolutionary basis, but it is not opposed to their principles to support a Constitution which guarantees the continuation of capitalism. It would be quite different for a socialist.

Majority Sentiment and Votes

It is demanded of the Open Letter comrades that they clarify what they mean by the ballot. Do they mean an expression of the majority will regardless of the present legalistic set-up, or do they mean adherence to the latter? Another question which the Open Letter leaves untouched is this: What is meant by a majority? Actually a majority means more than half, so that if there are 75 million qualified voters, it would take 37,501,000 voters to establish socialism. However, if 20 per cent. of the population did not vote, then it would take only one more than 30,000,000 to get a majority, but this 30,000,000 one vote would not represent a majority of the population, but only 40 per cent. The socialists would not represent a majority of the population at all, yet they would have a majority of those voting.

It behoves Open Letter advocates to signify which majority they seek, a majority of those eligible to vote, or a majority of the actual voters.

Under the present voting system, many people are not eligible to vote; for example, those under 21 years of age, those who cannot pay a poll tax in certain southern states, those who have been convicted for a "crime," and migratory workers and other workers who do not establish the proper residential requirements. In order to obtain an expression from the majority of the population, the socialist will have to conduct a struggle to have these and other disqualified people declared eligible to vote. Are the Open Letter comrades advocating that the WSP initiate such a campaign?

How much simpler and more scientific the position of the 1951 conference. The main task of socialists is to spread socialist ideas among the population. It runs candidates when and where it can to measure the revolutionary consciousness of the workers. When this consciousness reaches a majority sentiment (not actual votes, necessarily), the majority will know what to do. This consciousness may reveal itself in the ballots cast under our present legal set-up, or it may find expression in the growth of the socialist party.

Conditions Will Determine

When the Open Letter comrades ask, what other method than the ballot can a socialist majority use to show itself and the population as a whole that is a majority to begin with, they should first of all explain what is meant by the ballot. If they mean an expression of sentiment, then a very absence of votes—through a boycott of an election—may constitute such an expression of sentiment. If they mean a demonstration of socialist control, a political strike may constitute such a demonstration. If it is stated that there is no reason to engage in such activities as long as the ballot is open to the socialists, in reply we ask, what if the ballot is sealed to the socialists by the forces which control the State?

I. CANTER.
INNOCENTS ABROAD

The days of the Continental grand tour have long passed. The only way that the Continent can be seen by people (workers) from this country to-day, is by an ability to lower one's standard of living so that the travel allowance lasts out. It was on this assumption that the writer of this article set out from Dover this summer, on a two month lorry tour of Central Europe.

The distance involved (Zagreb, Yugoslavia was the turning point) precluded any possibility of making a real study of any of the countries we passed through, yet it was possible to gain general impressions, usually confirming our prejudices, though whether this was due to our finding what we wanted to find is difficult to say.

The most striking thing about Belgium was the number of houses built since the war. Outside the towns rows of small villas have been built, all of them ferociously individualised in façade. Holland was a pleasant relief by comparison, with its almost total absence of private building. In Belgian wages are higher but so were prices. In Holland prices were nearly all below English levels but since the average wage appeared to be about four pounds a week it amounted very much to six of one and half a dozen of the other.

It was raining and cold the afternoon we crossed into Germany. Frontier guards and customs men seemed a very melancholy lot. Despite frenzied building activity most of the great cities of the Rhine still have acres of rubble in what once were their centres.

The appearance of the population was startling. Cripples and maimed were everywhere. Men in their thirties on crutches, staggering around on artificial legs, waggling artificial arms around like seals' flippers or regarding one in what appears to be a quizzical manner but is in reality a straight look distorted by the plastic surgery pulling their faces. Apart from this depressing side of the picture we got an impression of tremendous industrial activity in the country.

We found the Germans kind and friendly—with the exception of the natives of Frankfurt. This city is the headquarters of the American occupation, and, rather in the manner of Earl's Court landladies, suffers from an ambivalence of emotions towards its guests. The Americans form a very large linguistic and cultural minority among the Germans, and their uniforms and striped nasal accents mark them out as much in Frankfurt as the negroes in the United States are marked out by their colour.

But they have money and the local tradespeople boast a large repertoire of tricks—short change, measure, etc., to which the wretched American soldier, who wants to be loved for himself and not for his money, submits.

In Munich we met a muscular lady, a trainer of what looked like tan wolves as guide dogs for the blind, who after screaming delight at meeting some English people—You always muddle through—told us that the Americans were tolerated simply to discourage the Russians from aggression and that otherwise they were extremely unpopular in the city because they were boorish, uncivilised, etc.

Austria seemed surprisingly different from Germany. Whether from history, geography, or any other factors, the people seemed more vivacious. We were warned before leaving Munich—that the Austrians are a very poor people—but in fact by appearance the workers were as well off or better off than the Germans we met. The remark probably arose out of a mild xenophobia. We found this everywhere. The Belgians warned us against the Dutch and the Dutch against the Belgians. Everybody warned us against the Germans and the Austrians warned us against the Yugoslavs.

The first town we came to in Yugoslavia, an industrial centre (by Yugoslav standards) called Jesenice, had poor quality autos in its shop windows priced at twenty pounds and more. The price of manufactured goods was high, for other things the country is undoubtedly the cheapest in Europe to people with sterling. It has other attractions, the glacial lake at Bled, which is heated by sulphur springs, is worth a considerable sacrifice in travel money on its own.

But it was the people that most impressed us in Yugoslavia. Their sociability and generosity was much more than one had a sense of "belonging" after being five minutes in a place. A garage proprietor whom we fetched from his house at bedtime opened up his workshop and cheerfully did our repairs and refused payment, saying, "I am an old motorist myself," as if we were members of a secret brotherhood. This was almost true. The number of vehicles in even the big towns was very small. Everywhere long lines of small carts drawn by two horses and each holding about a cubic yard of OOMBALA!!

One of our late rulers went to Africa during the recent Parliamentary recess to lecture to the natives about the benefits of our Welfare State. He had gathered at his feet and sang the praises of the National Health Service—"Our people are helped to get glasses, wigs and teeth," he cried.

"Oombala!" chanted the natives with feeling.

"We have decreased working hours and put up wages!"

"Oombala! Oombala!"

"And we have nationalised our railways!"

Again came the chorus, "Oombala!"

After the talk, the head man of the tribe came up to congratulate him and offered to show him the Temple of the Bull up on a nearby hill.

The M.P. was delighted at this chance to add a little local colour to the story he was preparing to tell his constituents, so off they went.

They passed dozens of Sacred Bulls and not a few Sacred Cows on the way up, and the M.P. was about to enter the Temple, when the head man pulled him back suddenly, "Be careful how you go!" he said, "It's knee deep in Oombala!"

A Plea for Clarity

Reply to "The Nature of the Socialist Revolution."

COMRADE EVANS may be the author of a very original thesis on the coming Socialist Revolution. But how are we to know? If obscurity be the hallmark of a brilliant thinker, the comrade would have achieved more, by writing with invisible ink. We would be as wise in either case. Enumeration of eight points from the article, indicate the high standard of obscurity coupled with the low standard of political accuracy.

A: ... We are busy discussing our own position. This healthy situation reflects the fact that socialists claiming to have accurate knowledge of society must always discuss the position. What were the “certainties” of the nineteenth century, and what does the phrase “consolidation of revolution” achieve mean? What was achieved? Who achieved it?

B: ... The Industrial Revolution established social production is not immediately followed by the revolution for social ownership, but by the State Capitalist revolution which establishes the institutional technique (and thereby the ideological demand) for the classless administration of the common wealth.

Reply—We are always discussing our position. This healthy situation reflects the fact that socialists claiming to have accurate knowledge of society must always discuss the position. What were the “certainties” of the nineteenth century, and what does the phrase “consolidation of revolution” achieve mean? What was achieved? Who achieved it?

Reply—The Industrial Revolution established Capitalist production. State capitalism is but a refinement of Capitalism, and does not amount to a revolution, the word revolution means complete change, fundamental re-construction or overthrow of a system. Where is the evidence that an ideological demand, exists for the classless administration of the common wealth?

C: ... The propositions here put forward have to be compressed ... much more than is said must be left unsaid, and, much more of what is said must be left unexplained.

Reply—If FORUM has been so ardently desired by Party members for expressing ideas, why in the very first issue do we meet with compression? If what I want to say, cannot be said, and, if more important, cannot be explained, what are we paying for? Or can it be that Comrade Evans knows not what to say nor what to leave unsaid?

D: ... State control further the depersonalising of property, this depersonalising begins the expropriation which is the Socialist aim.

Reply—There is a famous phrase which goes as Capitalism develops it becomes concentrated into fewer and fewer hands, in what sense is that depersonalising? The opposite tendency appears very much in evidence. Can any sort or degree of expropriation compatible with the socialist idea be named at the present day?

E: Within the State there begins the form of production for use.

Reply—All production, or most, has use as an aim, since the secondary function of commodities is use, but the primary aim remains extraction of profit. Where will you find production of a single button or tooth brush for the love of the thing?

F: The genius of Marx lay in his talent for seeing so clearly what was going on under his nose. And it still remains to some extent our evil genius that we see so clearly what went under Marx’s nose.

Reply—The second part makes the whole of this piece meaningless. Would it be unkind at this point to jibe, that the genius of Evans is in his talent for not seeing clearly what is going on under Evan’s nose?

Reply—Are we to understand that the spread—slight as it has been—of socialist ideas is not the work of propagandists? Explanation please! As to historical creativeness, surely that is in work done not words said. Changes in history are effected by actions, not by descriptions of actions.

To sum up. If ideas are expressed vaguely then they are open to distortion and misunderstanding, the fault being with the writer not the reader. If you want a child to know raspberry jam is bad for the sewing machine, you say so simply.

Please Comrade Evans treat us as children—but as intelligent ones!

OUR PREMISES

At the present time the Party has no cash in hand, and it has been suggested that our premises could either be sold or mortgaged, and the proceeds used to replenish our sadly depleted banking account and provide funds for an extension of our socialist propaganda. Having had the premises in use for many years, we have now had some additional experience on which to draw.

In view of the fact that the decision to go through with the purchase of these premises was bitterly contested by a portion of the membership, views expressed here may be subject to controversy. How does our experience of the past year measure up against our early hopes? What of the future?

Only very few, if any, of our members would consider the proposition of buying premises if they could be leased or rented. Last year, had we not bought premises we would have been able to afford only a few basement rooms or other unsuitable accommodation on rent.

Should we sell? If we did, although we would probably get back more than was paid out, we should then be in the same unpleasant position as we are now. Should we mortgage? Our organisation could use the money so obtained to spread our propaganda—a necessary preliminary, no doubt, to the attaining of our object. Although we should still retain the use of our premises, obtaining money on mortgage has disadvantage. We cannot sell the premises once. If we do purchase the premises we must pay the interest. A simple calculation will show that such interest payments will eventually exceed the principal—and, don’t forget, the original amount of loan will still be owing. If, on the other hand, we club together to repay the loan, there doesn’t seem a lot of point in getting a mortgage.

It might be a sounder scheme to consider methods of getting Party expenditure to equal income, and thus stop the financial rot that seems to have set in on our affairs.

For instance, the cost of stationery, speakers’ fares, etc., have risen during the last few years, but the dues have not been increased. There is a loss on the sale of the S.S. These are two leakages that could well be stopped.

Some Comrades, recognising that the acquisition of our present H.Q. has got us out of the trouble we were previously in, are content to leave the matter rest. Others of us have greater hopes regarding the development in the use of No. 52. We visualise it being built up as a centre of the socialist movement. The attainment of such an aim would have the effect of revitalising the Party generally through the spread of enthusiasm, as well as by the addition of new blood, i.e., of more workers for our cause.

More activity at No. 52 incidentally means more income from sales of literature; collections and canteen, and money can be made good use of. Producing political plays opens up another field of propaganda previously untried by the Party. Here also No. 52 could be used. Incidentally, this type of training would be helpful for young speakers.

When the Party decides to fight a parliamentary constituency in London, Clapham might be worth considering. There would be no extra cost of election premises, and the interest aroused might help to make the place better known as a Socialist centre.

Once our Premises at No. 52 have proved as useful as many of us believe is possible, then we can confidently anticipate the demand for establishment of premises for other Branches of the Party.

F. OFFORD.

REPLY

LET us agree at once that unless we can acquire suitable premises to lease or rent, it would be foolish to dispose of our present Head Office.

There is, however, no reason at all why we should not make every effort to find alternative accommodation. For, on the basis of the figures available, if we could rent premises for anything up to £9 per week (our present approximate running expenses at 52 Clapham High Street) we could dispose of our present premises and utilise the proceeds of the sale for propaganda purposes.

Let us then, not accept the position that we are committed for all time to staying at 52 Clapham High Street, but rather regard it as a temporary freezing of our funds until such time as they can be released for our real work of socialist propaganda.

It is, of course, not true to say that the Party had no alternative to purchasing the Clapham High Street premises. There were alternatives, e.g., the basement at Rugby Chambers for storage and the hiring of a small hall for E.C. meetings, but the majority of the members who crowded into the Habbon Hall on 19th February, 1951, were either unaware of them or had already made up their minds to have the Clapham High Street. It will be remembered that one of the reasons for the opposition to the scheme was that it was being thrust upon the Party without adequate information being available, and because no alternative schemes were considered. Another reason was that the scheme would place too great a strain on the financial resources of the Party and this, unfortunately, has proved correct. So much so that we are not considering all kinds of desperate remedies for what is virtually our financial ruin.

The cost of purchasing the premises, of carrying out repairs and alterations, and of the day to day running expenses involved, have played a large part in bringing us to our present financial difficulties. Moreover, a considerable amount must be spent on the premises before they can be fully utilised.

Let us turn to the “hopes regarding the development in the use of No. 52”, toquote the writer to whose article we are replying. He visualises No. 52 being used as a centre of socialist education. How is this to be done? Why, by urging the South West London Branch to organise Sunday evening meetings for the local workers and by producing political plays. It is perhaps unfair to complain of the poverty of the writer’s suggestions for what other activities could he suggest, apart from those which have nothing to do with socialist propaganda? Instead of finding premises suitable for our activities we are busily blocking activities suitable for our premises. And so, we get attempts to start activities for which there is no demand, and no enthusiasm in the Party. The realisation that there is insufficient Party activity, i.e., propaganda, education and organisation, fully to utilise the premises leads to suggestions for all kinds of social activity. It may be very well to have a club in Clapham for the benefit of those living nearby, and those who find it easy to reach, but it is a luxury for which the whole of the Party must pay and it can be maintained only at the expense of socialist propaganda.

It was argued by those in favour of purchasing the premises that the possession of them would lead to greater activities and enthusiasm. But it is over eighteen months since we moved in, and apart from Tuesday evenings there is seldom more than a handful of members on the premises.

The energies being put into the organisation of sales, jumble sales, canteen management and the energies required for the production of plays and so on, could surely be better spent on socialist propaganda.

The Party does not exist to provide a social life for its members. The fact that some members may derive a social life from their membership of the Party is incidental. The only reason for the Party’s existence is the necessity of organising propaganda for socialism.

What We Have We Hold

“This is a rusk’s progress. If there is one thing we are not prepared to do it is to give up our peace-keeping forces in Europe as a result of temporary war-time markets.”

“Peace Could Bring Biggest Slump”

Speaking at Louv yesterday, Mr. Cyril Osborne, M.P., said that if Marshal Stalin were to accept an invitation to the Coronation, or if the Korean war were to end, there would be a dreadful fall in commodity prices. Unless we make plans in conjunction with America to deal with the problems that must arise when the fighting ended, there would be the greatest slump the capitalist system had ever known.

“What, for example, is to happen to the stockpiles of strategic raw materials?” asked Mr. Osborne. “Will they be marketed in an orderly way and on a long-term plan? What about the men who will have to be trained to run these civilian jobs How long will it take to convert the engineering industry from war to peace production? What is to happen when the rearmament orders fall off?”

E. German ‘Socialism’

The time is now ripe for building Socialism in the German Democratic Republic, Walter Ulbricht, Deputy Prime Minister and General Secretary of the Socialist Unity Party, announced.

He stressed that the construction of Socialism would not entail the confiscation of small businesses, carried out on the basis of State demands in the first place the increase of Socialist property through the further development of the nationally owned sector of the economy, which has and will continue to be assumed by the claims of our opponents we have no intention of confiscating small businesses, since we do not wish to impose upon the state the unnecessary burden of controlling apparently unimportant activities which they at present carry out in the production.

The armed forces which will be raised in East Germany must be a defence of Socialism, a symbol of national socialism, in a spirit of respect for other nations and of love for the workers of all lands, stated President Wilhem Pieck in a speech to the Party Conference to reduce employment and still further the unemployment by employing large numbers of kitchen-dumping free agents to the destitute, and by the establishment of welfare work to enable others to earn sufficient to buy such supplies of food as are available.

Worth Remembering

Cyprus Plan

Mr. Antony Head, the War Minister, arriving back in London today after a 6,000-mile tour in the Middle East, said that there was no base which could be a place for the base but the project to establish a massive project and would take a number of years.

“We are not looking at Cyprus or any other place as an alternative base,” he said. “There is nowhere that can be compared with Egypt as a base for the Middle East. We have to have a base in the Middle East which is absolutely vital strategically.”

The base in Egypt is an immensely important installation, said Mr. Head, who had seen the site as a massive project and would take a number of years.

There is not another place as a quarter as good. It was vital to the defence of the West.

The Euston Times, 24/9/52.

If we did not have the base there, we should have no place for the base in the Middle East to concentrate, equip and maintain troops.
